The Week's Doings at the National Capital

THE INDIAN MAIDEN. HEN the Gossip a few weeks ago printed a verse of Gen. Van Vliet's, that veteran was assailed on all the new committee-rooms which the extension sides by imputations of the Capitol building was supposed to furnish that he was not really for the overcrowded Senate and House. These

One day last week | for occupancy for some months, and some of the General sat in his | the new committees which have recently been accustomed chair at the club, and became reminiscent of his early borhood of the Capitol building was under disdays in service, and told how, when he went to score the committee which has charge of the Florida, after graduat-

The General grew so eloquent over the subject, and his subsequent description of how rudely his dream was dispelled on witnessing the reality of the noble savage and his offspring, that one of the party sarcastically rethe party, if you turn out a good verse right "Good enough," and the General turned to the table and began to wrestle with the muse. In a little time he turned and said, triumphantly: "I've got it." This is good. I call it A DREAM DISPELLED. When in my younger days I strayed Along the trails in Everglade, I thought upon the Indian maid I'd read about in Tupper.

> I pictured her, as Fennimore In matchless tales of Indian lore, Fairer than all that lived before-(Those fairy tales, by Cooper).

At last, I saw a maid in camp, Wreteliedly ragged, dirty and damp; She looked quite like a modern tramp-And had baked dog for supper.

The enthusiasm was so great and the compliments so numerous, that the modest veteran blushed until his ears and the back of his neck grew rosy red, and then the lunch was ordered and eaten, and the rash doubter paid for that and the accompanying moisture.

The bodies of the two ladies were placed in separate hearses, and a double line of carriages, which was nearly half a mile long, followed to the cemetery. The funeral services were held at the White House, Rev. Dr. Elliott, of the Foundry Methodist Church, and Dr. Douglass, of St. John's Episcopal Church, officiating. The bodies of the unfortunate women were placed temporarily in the public vault at | here for some time. He is stopping at 905 Bock Creek Cemetery, and will be removed to Eighth street northwest. CHAPTER LIV.

DISEASES OF INFANCY-(continued.) The Hungarians have a tradition of a rustic who kept a frightfully-vicious dog, and refused to kill it or sell it at any price. "What makes you so fond of that wolfish-looking beast?" asked the neighbors. "Oh, it's a duty of gratitude," said Istuan. "I would be dead now if it wasn't for that dog." "Saved your life, did The bill, as amended, provides that all sol- he?" "Yes; I got drunk one day," said the owner of the werewolf, " and a doctor was just going to drug me, but this dog rushed him out of the house in the nick of time.'

A flock of guardian angels could not protect cradle better than a dog of that Hungarian breed, if he could be trained to chase away every vender of "baby-cordials." At a time of life when the stomach is too sensitive to digest even such moderately costive articles of food as cabbage and mince-meat, thousands of children are dosed with liquid fire in the form of "soothing cordials" and "baby-tonics," to counteract ailments which would have easily yielded to purely hygienic remedies, and which, by the repeated use of the rainous stimulant, are often aggravated into serious disorders.

CONVULSIONS.

Convulsions and chronic spasms are frequently produced in that way. The child lutches at the empty air, twists about as if in pain, and distorts its facial muscles in a way suggesting an effort to masticate a tough or unpalatable substance. In malignant cases the contortions resemble an epileptic fit, and the child may remain unconscious for minutes or hours together. An attempt to administer additional stimulants at such moments may result in a fatal termination of the affection, and in all but the most extreme cases relief may be obtained by placing the child into a warm bath, and bathing its head and neck with cool water. I have seen desperate convulsion-fits relieved in five minutes by that simple remedy; and after a lethargic sleep of five or six hours the patient is apt to awake as from a usual slumber, and attest the completeness of its recovery by lively symptoms of appetite. A plan to excite vomiting by administering a mixture of warm water and mustard may break the fit still more promptly, but the child is liable to remain restless and nervous for hours, or even experience a relapse of its convulsions. If the fit should be complicated with fever, a cool sponge bath is apt to bring relief more promptly and with less risk of distressing after-effects than any internal specifics. In so-called "silent fits," the child lies on its back as if in a deep slumber, while strange twitchings and grimaces pass over its face at shorter and shorter intervals till the patient wakes with a start, clutching its hands and gasping for air.

NIGHT VISIONS.

The above symptoms are sometimes followed by curious panics, fits of visionary terrors, strangely resembling those experienced by the Mr. Wilson (Iowa) presented a memorial victims of delirium tremens. After tossing about in a fitful half sleep the child suddenly Salem, Iowa, remonstrating against any appro- awakens with a wild scream, clasps the neck to express its emotions, shricks out for help against imaginary pursuers: wild beasts, owls public, Department of Iowa, of Belmont, Iowa, | with fire-eyes, and all sorts of crawling mon-

II.) obtained the floor on | ly-indigestible dish : cheese, pork, or mince-pie. Of the causal connection of flesh food and night panies, I had an amusing illustration last Summer in a little Southern Summer resort, where one of our four-handed traveling companions, a young Chacma baboon, had soon made himself as completely at home as in his native highlands. He would plunder erchards with or without the invitation of the proprietors, and often visited the stand of a fruit-pedler, who permitted him to help himself to a bunch of grapes, on condition that he should succeed in opening the lid of the grape-basket. But one evening a day-laborer, at work in the garden, had deposited the remnants of his dinner in a very similar basket, and acting upon the inspiration of an unguarded moment, Tommy tore off the lid of that depository and snatched out a big piece of liver-sausage. Five minutes after the rightful owner of that comestible started in pursuit with a stick, but Tommy scrambled up to the top of a garden-wall, where he devoured his prize in spite of a shower of brickbats. The retribution of his trespass overtook him, however, before the dawn of the next morning. At about 10 p. m. means and repreachful mumbles issued from the straw-box where he used to pass the night, and in the light of our night-lamp we saw the little sinner kick out his feet as if in the act of repulsing a persistent intruder, till suddenly the box became too small for a scene of his tragic performance, and with a whoop of horror the experimenter in liver-sausage darted out and rushed up an armchair, which he proceeded to clutch in a very paroxysm of panic, every now and then looking back at the box, and as often averting his head as from a vision too horrld for the endurance of mortal eyes. The old-time custom of letting children cat their meals at a table of their own had its occasional advantages if the menu of their elders included too many dishes of flesh-food. Fortunately, the dietetic mistakes of our modern educators are to some degree rectified by the circumstance that children instinctively prefer sweet farinaceous preparations and fruit to the most tempting viands. Watch a crowd of children at a school-picnic or a newsboys' excursion. With rare exceptions, they will reserve their energies for pies and pudding, and leave their ham-sandwiches for canine after gleaners. At the table of a public hotel, with a clever French cook, special ragouts may achieve universal popularity, but the number of juvenile votes will depend upon the excellence of the dressing, the sauce, with its various vegetable admixtures, being apt to disappear long before the adjunct morsels of meat. To such predilections, perhaps, is due the circumstance that only in childhood dreams are pleasant enough to be remembered for years, like fairy-land adventures; and there is no doubt that the frequency of nightmares could be reduced one-half by reducing the size of our flesh-pots. Our ultra-rationalistic age can hardly be accused of increasing the nightterrors of young children by ghostly nurserytales, and the instinctive dread of darkness seems, in some cases, to be hereditary-a transmission, perhaps, from the times when the slumbers of our savage ancestors were frequently broken by the prowling giant-cats of the tropics. On the whole, it is not a safe plan to cure such tendencies by compulsory measures such as forcing a timid child to pass a long Winter night alone and in a dark bed-room. Life-long nervousness may be the result of such experiments, and at all events it can do no harm to postpone the cure to after-years, and, in the meantime, permit the little visionary to banish his ghosts by the cheap expedient of a little rushlight.
